

Reconnective healing accesses a new gateway

Today's numerous healing modalities are currently riding a huge wave of general acceptance. More and more clients are sharing their personal experiences with friends and family while scientific research is validating many approaches' theoretical underpinnings.

It wasn't very long ago that public opinion was highly skeptical of chiropractic, homeopathy, kinesiology, Chinese medicine, and other "alternative" branches of healing. Nowadays, these same disciplines are so trusted that even mainstream insurance policies willingly pay for them.

Most of the "new" healing methods actually have long histories or are modern derivatives of ancient practices.

One new healing methodology that has garnered widespread attention and acclaim is "reconnective healing," which was developed by Dr. Eric Pearl beginning in 1993. A successful chiropractor in Los Angeles, many of his clients suddenly began reporting visions of angels, spontaneous channeling, and miraculous healing when he simply placed his hands near to them. Pearl's hands subsequently blistered and experienced unexplained bleeding. He eventually came to believe that these manifestations were due to a bandwidth of energy that first appeared on the planet through him.

Pearl's seminal book entitled "The Reconnection: Heal Others, Heal Yourself" explains these quantum based frequencies and how people can employ them to restore physical, mental, emotional, and spiritual balance to their lives. However, he uses the term "reconnection" to refer to the restoration of an individual's vibrational connection to planetary patterns, and this differs somewhat from "reconnective healing," which is the theme of this article.

Reconnective healers are taught to immerse a client in the new frequencies to stimulate the body to heal itself, yet there is no real treatment because the healer merely serves as a conduit for the appropriate energies. Despite its simplicity, reconnective healing is credited with remedying people suffering from cancers, mental illnesses, depression, chronic fatigue syndrome, and many other disabilities and ailments. Often the first session is sufficient to restore full functioning, but sometimes one or two follow-up sessions are necessary to allow the client to completely receive the healing.

Raiden Leigh Knight is a certified reconnective healer and former training assistant who has studied under Pearl since 2001. "In reconnective healing, the person lying down controls the session. I hold the person in wholeness, seeing them as unbroken, as complete. I see that person in perfection and bring the Light through to them. People lay down and they get up different, in a positive way."

Instead of having clients focus on problematic areas, they are simply asked to relax and to remain observant while lying on a massage table. The healer passes his hands above the person's body during a 45-minute session. "If they remain open, things get resolved very quickly," Raiden commented. "It's not like seeing a counselor where you have to keep coming back. They realize that they are whole and start to outwardly manifest that."

In my reconnective healing session, I readily relaxed and quickly fell into a light trance state wherein I was observing while surrendering to whatever appeared. At various points, I felt my chest being lifted up, a tingling in my hands, an oppressive heaviness, the heat of Raiden's hands above my head (although they were positioned almost a foot away), cold feet, and a lightness of being. Brief dreamlike images swirled by me of a floating wooden bridge, a woman smoking a cigarette with the lit end in her mouth, a cluster of hands held aloft for high-fives, a lion's head directly above me, and three Indian women dancing around a music box.

At the conclusion of my session, I was slightly altered and strangely reinvigorated. I knew that it would take a while for me to integrate my full experience, yet I felt no compulsion to "figure it out."

"You'll see what happens to you," Raiden said. "After integration, people tend to be very calm and balanced. They find their purpose, and they are OK with their lives. Usually the people who come to see me are ready to be more of who they are, to get rid of their limitations. At age 57, I know I'm in better physical shape than when I was at 30. I don't wear glasses anymore and my severe hypoglycemia is gone. I see people live happily, and I know what reconnective healing has done for me."

The night following my reconnective healing session was my weekly dreaming practice, at which time I meditate and pray for 30 minutes starting at 3 a.m. That particular night was especially rewarding because my prayers were quickly answered with palpable signs of power. I assume that the reconnective healing had opened me to receive these spiritual vibrations more clearly and more profoundly. What an amazing gift!
